

war tax (internal revenue) and premium on gold opening up the chance for American manufacturers.

Next to Great Britain, the United States is the largest consumer of Cuban cigars and there isn't a factory on the island that is not open to any buyer who has the money or the credit. At least, all the larger and better known factories are eager at all times for orders, and your dealer can obtain for you any kind, color, shape or size to fit your purse or please your taste. This also applies to Key West, Tampa and New York factories and factories generally throughout the United States.

Do not believe the many stories you hear about the "Crowned Heads of Europe" getting all the good cigars, or the Van Astorbills and Morganfellers smoking them all up. The Crowned Heads and Morganfellers couldn't possibly get away with all the fine cigars that are made unless they have a smoke consumer that we know nothing about in St. Louis.

A recent wire to the press reports: "Cuban cigars now made in this country;" "fake cigars are being made and unscrupulous dealers in New York are selling them for the real article." This is no doubt true, the incentive being increased profits. For this small gain the dealer runs the risk of getting caught both by his customer and the government with the sure penalty of business ruin, a heavy fine and quite likely a term in the penitentiary.

The tobacco plant was first cultivated as an ornamental plant and afterwards for its medicinal virtues. Then smoking was taken up as a luxury, but the popes, priests and sultans in the early part of the seventeenth century decreed against it and declared smoking a crime. Smokers' noses were cut off and death served up to them in every cruel form. Those old churchmen and rulers must have formed their prejudice against smoking from riding on the rear platforms of crowded morning cars.

It is not pleasant to meet the man accustomed to taking sundry "appetizers" before dinners of corned beef, cabbage, raw onions, schmierkase, etc., washed down with steins of beer, producing an "aroma" of the breath to shame the air, and a coating on the tongue that couldn't be cleared off with a scraper, and hear him declare he "got hold of a cigar so strong and vile that it made him sick," rank enough "to drive a dog out of a bone-yard," and if he could not obtain "mild" cigars would have to give up smoking. Poor little cigar, how many sins you have to answer for.

Don't imagine a dark cigar is strong or a light cigar mild. This is not the case. Tobacco properly cured and matured is the best in quality, the most smokable, and the pleasantest to taste. Such tobacco is often of a dark brown shade. Some light tobacco is mild; often it is strong and bitter, made so from forced growth and curing to please the eye of the smoker who smokes with his eye rather than his mouth.

Mr. Smokerman, if you are in any doubt about the kind of cigar you want leave it to your dealer. He is in a position to know the market, the brands that are popular, and will gladly get the cigar you are looking for if he hasn't it in stock. It is his business and desire to please you.—Tobacco Leaf.
